

To Whom It May Concern:

Our rights to internet access are in line with our rights as paying customers for these services. It shouldn't be left to the president to determine how we receive these services. He doesn't understand how they work. He therefore shouldn't decide what's best for us as Americans while defending what's best for business. He wasn't good at either of them. . Why would you as an agency take what he has to say under advisement and act on it?

The Obama era protections currently in place keeps things fair. Removing them makes access unfair, controlled and hampers the experience that we pay for. Removing these protections could backfire producing the ultimate reversal - causing businesses like Verizon and Comcast to lose customers. Most will stay and deal with it because we rely on the internet for many daily tasks. But look beyond that. It's a teaching tool in schools. Many use it to get an education. Think of how it changes the lives of people in rural areas or anywhere there is a digital divide. We can't think that far - because we want to give big business the tools they need to do whatever they want. It's our new normal.

Protect net neutrality - its good for business but greater for all of us.
